

Interdisciplinarity and administrative jurisprudence

Rixer Adam

Karoli Gaspar University Of Reform Church, Budapest, Hungary

Abstract: An interdisciplinary approach to something means that the problem is studied using a new approach that seeks to harmonise the methods and concepts of several disciplines or fields. Public administration is itself an interdisciplinary field, building on a variety of disciplinary approaches and values, and the conceptual framework of administrative law is also constantly expanding. The aim of the presentation is to foster openness to other disciplines and subdisciplines, and to demonstrate that hybrid, mixed forms are increasingly dominant in legal postmodernism, both in substantive administrative law and in administrative jurisprudence. Ultimately, it is the development of the capacity for continuous methodological innovation.

In addition to the general features of interdisciplinarity, the presentation will also introduce in more detail some new 'intermediate' disciplines - by examining their characteristics in greater depth, arriving at generalisable experiences. The interdisciplinary areas chosen have in common that, on the one hand, they provide a sufficiently broad horizon of investigation and, on the other hand, they can be clearly linked to contemporary problems. This is certainly the case, for example, in the field of the interpretation of various crises, in the field of law and fiction, or in the field of identity studies, which is now taking roots but is also seeking its place, or in the field of integrity studies. Another fascinating question is how to research the science itself, i.e. the current specificities, new directions and major contemporary features of a discipline. Digitisation is also an inescapable element of any scientific research today: it is becoming increasingly important as an object and a tool of research, and its containment and rational use are becoming increasingly important. I would also like to demonstrate the impact of interdisciplinarity on the dissemination of scientific results and teaching of administrative law.